Students Use Lens to Show Emotions

Photography teacher, Mrs. Dina Kwit, took advantage of the unconventional circumstances created by the Coronavirus shut down to teach her students the art of photojournalism - using one's camera to capture a visual representation of an experience.

"With the pandemic situation and the on-line learning for students, I thought it would be a good idea for my students to be able to share their feelings about what is happening in their lives right now," said Kwit, who tasked her students with capturing an image of how they are personally coping with the pandemic. An essay of 300 words accompanying their image was also assigned.

Kwit was very amazed at the results she received. With seniors struggling with their final months of school and athletes coming to terms with having no spring sports season, most acknowledged their distress. "I never expected to see and read such deep reflections on how the lives of students have changed. Some of the student's essays were very deep and revealed the physical and emotional struggles a young person is going through. I feel that their self expressions are probably very similar to what their classmates are going through as well." She hopes that in ten years students will look back on this assignment and remember what they considered important and how their view of the world changed.
